Frank Welsh's history of Hong Kong, "A Borrowed Place," does a fairly good job of providing context for the political situation over there. It does a less complete job of capturing anything of the social or cultural flavor of the city, though, focusing almost exclusively on the colonial administration and relations between London and Beijing.

The Romans borrowed and adapted the alphabet from the Etruscans, who in turn had borrowed and adapted it from the Greek colonies of Italy. Senior officials of the Roman Republic derived their insignia from the Etruscans: curule chair, purple-bordered toga (toga praetexta), and bundle of rods (fasces).
