The extraordinary story of James Banning, the first African-American pilot to fly across country During the Great Depression, James Banning was a young school teacher in the Los Angeles area. The Great Depression had taken a painful toll on his family. His father had died of tuberculosis, and his mother was forced to sell the family home to pay the medical bills. Mr. Banning was left to support his mother and younger siblings on his own. He worked for a time as a laborer, but it was not enough to support his family. In search of better opportunities, he decided to leave California and travel to New York City to find work in a large city. He found a job as a janitor, but he dreamed of becoming a pilot. He saved his money and bought a small airplane. He trained at a local airport and soon became a skilled aviator. He was determined to succeed and made every effort to achieve his goal. He practiced every day and never gave up. Finally, his dream came true. In 1932, he became the first African-American pilot to fly across the country. He was a hero to many and an inspiration to people everywhere.
